“When will our consciences grow so tender that we will act to prevent human misery rather than avenge it?”
~Eleanor Roosevelt

“Our deeds determine us, as much as we determine our deeds.”
~George Elliot

Notes from Michelle

There are so many conversations that are either hard to have with our children or we assume we do not need to have them with our children. Race relations can be one of those difficult topics. However, it is crucial. It is even more crucial if your neighborhood or community is not one of vast diversity. There have been studies about the assumptions that children make about their parents' views if the subject is not discussed. There is so much on the news these days that opens a door for that conversation with your child. There are even topics they may be learning at school in history that would allow for you to start that conversation. Of course this is a personal choice but sometimes it does come into the school. Common Sense Media and other websites for parents are often great places to start if you would like to find material to help you with the conversations.

Please make sure that you are scheduling time to observe your child's classroom and for a conference. Please remember that this is the best way to understand your child's educational progress.

Notes from Michelle (con't)

Next week, the AP will be leaving for our trip to NYC!!! We are so excited. Hopefully we can send some updates to be posted in our absence.

Have a great weekend.
